

BLUE LAGOON

The warm waters are rich in minerals like silica and sulphur and bathing in the Blue Lagoon is reputed to help some people suffering from skin diseases such as psoriasis. The water temperature in the bathing and swimming area of the lagoon averages 37–39 °C (99–102 °F). The Blue Lagoon also operates a research and development facility to help find cures for other skin ailments using the mineral-rich water.

In 1976, a pool formed at the site from the waste water of the geothermal power plant that had just been built there. In 1981, people started bathing in it after its supposed healing powers were popularised. In 1992, the Blue Lagoon company was established and the bathing facility was opened for the public. In recent years, several cosmetics companies have begun marketing skin care products using mud purportedly extracted from the Blue Lagoon, their effectiveness still subject to debate.

The rich mineral content is provided by the underground geological layers and pushed up to the surface by the hot water. Because of its mineral concentration, water cannot be recycled and must be disposed of in the nearby landscape, a permeable lava field. The silicate minerals is the primary cause of that water's milky blue shade. After the minerals have formed a deposit, the water rein filtrates the ground, but the deposit renders it impermeable over time, hence the necessity for the plant to continuously dig new ponds in the nearby lava field.
